

Confidence dips

Consumer confidence fell in January after two straight months of big gains as Americans became more worried about their incomes, rising gas prices and business conditions, the Conference Board said Tuesday. Its Consumer Confidence Index is at 61.1, down from a revised 64.8 in December. The index rose by more than 20 points last month from 40.9 in October amid growing signs of an improving economy.